Excerpt: . CHAPTER III. Characteristics Of Cudworth's Philosophy. Section I. Cudworth's Platonism. CUDWORTH is usually designated the Cambridge Platonist. There can be no question that he tried to read as much of the philosophy of Christianity into the words of Plato as a fair rendering and interpretation would allow. It was Cudworth's purpose to show how close to the philosophy of revelation the best thought of the ancient world approached. He has been criticised most largely on the score that he saw more in the words of Plato than the classical commentators of his day could discern. Cudworth's age was not a time when a reconciliation of paganism and Christianity was looked upon with favor. Consequently, all attempts by our author to identify the Christian Trinity with the Platonic triplicity were regarded with suspicion, and largely on this account did he...
