Stead, of the London Review of Reviews and Senator Benjamin Tillman of South Carolina In presenting this pamphlet to the public, I think a few prefatory remarks are needed in order to call the attention of my readers to the national and international reputation of the men to whom I addressed open letters, in the hope that we might publicly debate the question of the white man's dealings with colored races under British and American rule. Mr. W. T. Stead, editor of the Review of Reviews (London, England), is without doubt the leading journalist in the world. Not only is Mr. W. T. Stead a fluent and voluminous writer, but he is a brilliant and an eloquent conversationalist and public speaker. Besides the enormous number of daily newspapers, weekly and monthly magazines and reviews for which Mr. Stead has written, he is the well known author of hundreds, and perhaps it would be no exaggeration to state, thousands of pamphlets and books. Mr. W. T. Stead is more than a journalist and an author of books and pamphlets, he is a strong advocate of international arbitration as the one and only sure means by which international difficulties may be adjusted in order that peace and good-will may some day rule the hearts of men. Perhaps W. T. Stead is best known in the United States of America as the author of that famous book of his, If Christ Came to Chicago. This remarkable book was published in this country and in England soon after the Columbian Exposition of 1893 and...
