I think it was about a month afterwards that a sixteenth cousin left my mother twenty thousand pounds. It will just pay off our most importunate creditors, and equip me for Melton, said Mr. Pelham. It will just redeem my diamonds, and refurnish the house, said Lady Frances. The latter alternative was chosen. My father went down to run his last horse at Newmarket, and my mother received nine hundred people in a Turkish tent. Both were equally fortunate, the Greek and the Turk; my fathers horse lost, in consequence of which he pocketed five thousand pounds; and my mother looked so charming as a Sultana, that Seymour Conway fell desperately in love with her. Mr. Conway had just caused two divorces; and of course, all the women in London were dying for him judge then of the pride which Lady Frances felt at his addresses. The end of the season was unusually dull, and my mother, after having looked over her list of engagements, and ascertained that she had none remaining worth staying for, agreed to elope with her new lover. The carriage was at the end of the square. My mother, for the first time in her life, got up at six o'clock. Her foot was on the step, and her hand next to Mr. Conways heart, when she remembered that her favourite china monster and her French dog were left behind. She insisted on returning re-entered the house, and was coming down stairs with one under each arm, when she was met by my father and two servants. My fathers valet had discovered the flight (I forgot how), and awakened his master. When my father was convinced of his loss,...
